When WE Offer An Article For Sale

And call it something, we're quite sure there's no false label on it; quite sure, indeed, that it is just what we call it, or we wouldn't expect to hold our position in the trade very long.

We haven't labored steadily well on toward the quarter century mark to reach the top in our line of business just to fool away that good name we prize so much on a game of chance like misrepresenting an article of food.

ANECDOTAL.

Little Stories Brought Out by Judge Widemann's Death.

Judge C. F. Hart said to a BULLETIN man yesterday that the late Judge Widemann was the first man who gave him employment in the Hawaiian Islands. It was when Mr. Widemann was manager of Lihue plantation early in the fifties.

The late J. F. B. Marshall was owner of the plantation. And thereby hangs a tale. Mr. Marshall had a dam built to confine water for mill purposes. He left the islands only to return after a lapse of more than thirty years. On this occasion, shortly before his death, Mr. Marshall visited his old stamping ground at Lihue. Strange to say, the very day he called there, his old dam gave way and let all the water out. The natives regarded the coincidence as an omen of weird significance. Mr. Marshall's visit to the islands was properly regarded as a notable event. Public addresses made by him were gladly heard by large audiences. He was one of the commissioners hurried off by stealth to plead for Hawaiian independence in Washington and London when Lord George Paulet had seized the islands for Great Britain in 1843. They found a potent friend in Daniel Webster.

"Judge Widemann was always ready to assist the distressed and poor," said a business man of long residence. In illustration of this tribute the speaker related an incident that came under his own observation. Judge Widemann and other prosperous Hawaiian residents were coming home in the same steamer from San Francisco. There were two estimable musical artists on board, who had failed to improve their fortune on the Coast. They had indeed gone through their reserve funds and were coming to Honolulu rather disheartened, with little or no resources except their talent.

After the usual concert on the last night out, one of the gentlemen proposed the getting up of a complimentary purse for these ladies. Judge Widemann quickly plumped down a $20 gold piece as a starter, and called on a fellow "sugar baron" to cover it. The gentleman accosted demurred a little, saying he thought $5 apiece would make a goodly purse.

"Cover that now!" Judge Widemann exclaimed. "You have made $75,000 out of sugar this last year." And the coin was "covered," and other coins were added, until a purse of more than a hundred dollars was contributed.
